Transcontinental Railroad-150th Anniversary and Continuing Contributions of Chinese Americans

Artwork by Iris Xu (L) and Anne Liu (R), 2017 National Art Contest | Our Community, Our Future

150 years ago the Transcontinental Railroad that stretched across the United States of America and linked the east and west coasts was completed. Facing poverty and civil war at home, laborers from Guangdong Province in China left home to make a living to support their families. Chinese immigrants were recruited by railroad labor contractors to do the dangerous and difficult jobs such as blasting areas with explosives, laying track, and carrying heavy cargo in extremely hot and cold weather. The Chinese laborers would eventually create a transportation system that would easily connect people and trade goods.

Railroad laborers marked the first wave of Chinese immigrants to come work in the United States. They were paid the lowest wage and had to take on the dangerous jobs. Today, Chinese Americans are not only railroad workers. They hold various jobs that contribute to the workforce. Look around your community. What kind of different jobs do you see Chinese Americans working in? Draw some of the jobs or kinds of work you see.
